Ethical decisions are often judged not only by their outcomes but also by the principles on which the decisions are based. In the study of philosophy, theories of moral justification are often classified into one of two major systems. These two systems, known as teleological justification and deontological justification, can be applied to ethical decision making.

Teleological ethics (from the Greek telos, “end”; logos, “science” or “reason”) refers to a moral decision defined by an end result, goal, or outcome. Teleological justification holds that the basic standard for an action being classified as morally justified is based on whether or not the action achieves a morally desirable outcome or goal. In other words, it is the consequences of an action that determine its ethicality or moral worth. Teleological morality is reflected in the argument that “the end justifies the means.”

Deontological ethics (from the Greek deon, “duty”; logos, “science” or “reason”) holds that the basic standard for an action being classified as morally right or wrong is independent of the good or evil consequences that are generated by the action. Deontology is based on the moral duty or obligation one has toward another person, such as the duty to be honest or the duty to be benevolent. Deontological moral obligations are based on the foundational moral principles of autonomy, beneficence, nonmaleficence, justice, fidelity, and veracity. In the words of ethicist Celia Fisher (2009), “deontological theory prioritizes absolute obligations over consequences” (p. 40), whereas teleological theory “prioritizes the consequences (or utility) of an act over the application of universal principles” (p. 41).

The Golden Rule, which is shared in some form by no fewer than 12 of the world’s major religions, reflects deontological morality based on moral duty and obligation: “Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.” This cornerstone moral principle reflects universality (applying the same principle to every person in a similar situation), which takes into consideration the application of moral principles regardless of a person’s race, gender, religion, socioeconomic level, and so forth. The universality of the principle of justice is depicted by the icon of Justitia, the Roman goddess of justice, wearing a blindfold that represents the objective application of justice (“blind justice”) regardless of the identity, social standing, or financial status of the accused.

The universality of the Golden Rule must be balanced with diversity, which is not blind but which takes into consideration the differences of persons in a similar situation. Sometimes described as the Platinum Rule (Doverspike, 2000), this variant takes into consideration differences such as race, ethnicity, gender, national origin, religion, sexual orientation, disability, socioeconomic level, and so forth: “Do unto others as they would have you do unto them.” Nevertheless, as a single general principle, the original Golden Rule represents probably the single most encompassing test of the ethicality of one’s actions: “Are these actions something that I want others to do to me? Conversely, are these actions something that I would not want done to me?”

In addition to the Golden and Platinum Rules, there are other tests of the ethicality of one’s actions. In making an ethical decision with respect to one’s course of action in a specific situation, a simple ethics checklist can be derived from 10 basic questions or tests of ethicality (Doverspike, 2000):
1. Universality Test: Would I recommend these actions to anyone in the same situation? In placing principles above personalities, the test of universality asks whether I would recommend these same actions to another person operating in similar circumstances.

2. Justice Test: Are these actions fair to everyone involved? Conversely, will my actions unfairly discriminate against stakeholders (i.e., others affected by the action) on the basis of age, race, gender, religion, sexual orientation, and so forth?

3. Diversity Test: Are these actions fair to the specific person involved? Will my actions appropriately take into consideration the other person’s age, race, gender, religion, sexual orientation, socioeconomic level, and so forth?

4. Honesty Test: Do my actions represent the whole truth and nothing but the truth? Viewed from its polar opposite, dishonesty not only includes acts of commission (e.g., committing a lie by distortion, misinformation, or bearing a false witness) but also acts of omission (e.g., omitting the truth by not disclosing a minor detail or important information that the other person would want to know).

5. Religion Test: Are my actions consistent with my faith? Would I be able to explain my actions to my rabbi, priest, pastor, imam, sponsor, or spiritual director? In other words, am I practicing what I am preaching? More importantly, am I practicing what the most respected spiritual leaders in my religion are preaching?

6. Parent’s Test: Would I be able to explain my actions to my child? Would I expect him or her to act in the same way?

7. Child’s Test: Would I be able to explain my actions to my mother or father? Would I expect them to be proud of my actions? Would I be proud of my child for doing what I am thinking of doing? Conversely, am I hiding my actions from my parent because I know it is wrong?

8. Publicity Test: This one is also known as the Reputation Test or Front Page Test. How would I feel if my actions were reported on the front page of my local newspaper? Would I want my actions to be posted on Facebook?

9. The Privacy Test: This one is also known as the Conscience Test or Dark Parking Lot Test. Even if no one were looking, would my actions leave me with a clear conscience? Conversely, would my actions go against my conscience?

10. The Consequences Test: What are the possible consequences of my actions? What are the short-term and long-term benefits and risks of my actions on others who may be affected? In professional practice, this test is considered a cornerstone of decision-making: What is in the best interest of the client?

How does this list of questions correspond to teleological or deontological ethics? How does each of the 10 checklist items correspond to either a teleological or deontological moral justification? Review each of the items and consider the definitions of teleological (T) and deontological justification (D).
